UN struggles to close NKorea arms trade loophole

(Bloomberg) – The Trump administration is calling North Korea a state sponsor of terrorism and is stepping up pressure on China to cut off all ties with its neighbor after Pyongyang's test of another intercontinental ballistic missile this week.

But an emergency United Nations Security Council meeting Wednesday showed how hard it is to punish what is already one of the world's most isolated regimes. No new sanctions were proposed, and the meeting started by highlighting one of the most intractable problems with existing sanctions: many nations simply ignore them.

"There are countries that are continuing to fund the North Korean nuclear program by violating U.N. sanctions and obstructing our efforts," U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. Nikki Haley said. "The world knows who many of them are."

While China has the most extensive trade relationship with North Korea, including an oil pipeline into the country, U.N. investigators say nations from Angola to Kuwait have maintained ties that help Kim Jong Un's regime earn much-needed hard currency. Even with the Security Council's backing, U.S. envoys and U.N. officials find those dealings are stubborn barriers to getting all nations to sever ties with North Korea.

"The Achilles' heel of every sanctions regime is its implementation," said George Lopez, a sanctions expert and professor emeritus at the University of Notre Dame.

African nations have been particularly problematic, according to the U.N.

U.N. officials have investigated at least seven African countries for violations of sanctions against North Korea. Pyongyang's trade in small arms to several African nations continues despite being prohibited by the U.N. and accounts for about $100 million a year, according to Enrico Carisch, a former U.N. Security Council sanctions expert who tracked illicit North Korean trade.

> "The Achilles' heel of every sanctions regime is its implementation."
> – George Lopez, professor emeritus at the University of Notre Dame

"Some countries don't see North Korea as a threat to their national security," said Carisch, who founded the advisory firm Compliance & Capacity Skills International. "It's not in the national interest of African states to shut down the supply of cheap and good North Korean arms that they need for their own national security."

That attitude is frustrating the White House and State Department, which are trying to manage the preeminent foreign policy threat facing the Trump administration. Haley on Wednesday called on all nations to cut all ties with Pyongyang, recognition that even small amounts of hard currency from military training or guest workers abroad help sustain Kim's regime.

Catalonia vote sparks thousands of firms to move

(The Washington Post) – If Catalonia's bid for independence goes through, it'll change everything about how companies there do business.

Catalonia won't be a member of the European Union. It might not even be in the euro zone. The region would need a currency, rules on immigration and newly negotiated trade deals. And those arrangements won't be easy to come by. Spain has already made it clear that it won't negotiate with Catalonia. The European Union has been leery to suggest a relationship as well.

In theory, independence was supposed to make the region more prosperous. But the October referendum - and Spain's subsequent takeover - has left businesses nervous. Since the vote, more than 2,700 firms have moved their headquarters from the region, according to Spain's commercial registrar's office, the Agence France-Presse reported. That list includes major banks such as Caixabank and Sabadell, along with small and medium firms.

Many of these shifts are administrative. But they may be the first step to relocating staff and production. As AFP explains: "While tensions have eased somewhat since Spain's central government last month took direct control of the Northeast region and has scheduled regional elections in December, many businesses in Catalonia still feel the need to guard against uncertainty."

One businessman, who owns a small wine and spirits shop, explained that his sales have plunged 30 percent since Catalonia's referendum. In response, he has set up a duplicate distribution firm in Madrid. His products will still be produced in Catalonia, but they will have a Madrid address.

"We won't sell anymore if we don't do this," he said. "This is a decision you take when you have no other choice." He, like other business executives, requested anonymity in the AFP report because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Another drug distribution company is moving from Barcelona to Seville. "Patients say 'give me a product that is not Catalan.' This has never happened before," the company's director told AFP. That shift is also designed to ensure the company remains within the European Union's legal framework. "We would go bankrupt because the medicines we import would be subject to customs duties," he said.

Seaside concert draws hundreds to Ypao

With the island sun blazing down, the Guam Symphony Society's Seaside Holiday Concert yesterday drew several hundred people eager to kick off the holiday season to the Gov. Joseph Flores Beach Park Amphitheater in Tumon. An afternoon of music and mayhem was on tap for the families who enjoyed arts and crafts, food, photo booths, contests, Santa stations and face painting. A visit from Santa on his carabao sleigh capped off the afternoon of fun. The St. John's School String Group and Mangilao Hot Jazz group opened the afternoon of musical performances before the Guam Symphony Orchestra and Chorale took the stage, led by musical director and conductor Stephen Bednarzyk.
