Nature of Work Experience

Overseeing and managing federal grants and cooperative agreements contained in this portfolio involved complex professional administrative work in order to effectuate the various program tasks, objectives, and overarching goals governing each program. Programs managed are complex and multidisciplinary consisting of land use planning, energy securities, natural resource management (involving coastal areas, benthic habitat, and marine ecosystems), community engagement, workforce development, infrastructure development, and endangered species monitoring, and social economic risk factors. These programs are managed within the context of a wide range of regulatory interface through compliance with federal and local laws involving multiple state, community, and federal agencies. Responsible for representing program on both the local and national level.

Illustrative Examples of Experience

Duties have included the successful administration of programs, projects and activities, which include providing leadership and directing all program activities, developing and coordinating comprehensive community and state level comprehensive plans in conjunction with federal, local and private organizations. Directed the use and development of Geographic Information System based tools to discern land and natural features for planning and assessing development impact, and supervise up to 7 staff, as well as provide testimonies to the Legislative Committee on Natural Resource and Military Affairs. In certain occasions new methods were implemented and policies/procedures for improving operations were created in accordance with each program's specific need. In certain instances, creating change stemmed from federal regulatory compliance issues and in others, operation effectiveness was the primary driver. This involved a process of establishing priorities based on logic models that were grounded and vetted by identifying core antecedence, which in turned shaped the scope of how resources were mobilized and adjusted. Priority setting as a management tool was used as a control and mitigate "mission creep" and to keep the projects in this portfolio on task and conducted a way that can be evaluated according to standards of measurable outputs and outcomes.

Strategic plans were created for various purposes; for example, the creation of Guam Energy Strategic plan served as a multi agency guiding document that agencies could collaborate on various layers of engagement according to a set of standards that outline a common vision. Whereas, program specific plans under the Regional Assistant Development grant was more focus on building regional capacity in renewable energy through less formal cooperation. In the case of the Western Pacific Coral Reef Institute, planning was specific to fostering management driven research, which almost always involved community engagement. In all cases modern methods of effective planning consisted of 1) assessment of the socioeconomic needs of the population, identifying resources and partners, determining readiness level and optimal public support – 2) determining capacity and identifying/operational system gaps – 3) developing action items and determining key milestones 4) implementation of various plans and ensure feedback loops are in place to provide real time feedback on progress – 5) evaluation of outcomes and outputs and interpreting data to be disseminated to the public, various regulatory agencies, and policy makers.
